9. The Effect of "Imposed" vs. "Non-Imposed" Leaders

In most cases, interveners both remove the old leader and install a new leader. In about 17 cases, however, interveners do not exert direct control over who takes power after FIRC. If interveners are choosing strategically and well, FIRCs where they choose the new leader ought to have a lower likelihood of civil war afterward than FIRCs where they don't. Analysis shows that this is true only for FIRCs overall; for leadership FIRCs (which comprise all cases where civil war occurred after a non-imposed FIRC) the difference is not significant.

2. Evidence against Selection Bias: Confounding Variables

The first column lists thirteen characteristics of states that could potentially cause both regime change and civil war.¹ The second column shows the hypothesized effect of the variables listed in the first column on the likelihood of regime change based on the discussion earlier in the chapter. The third column shows the actual relationship between each variable and regime change found by my analysis in the supplementary materials, while the final column shows the effect of these variables on the probability of civil war as demonstrated in this chapter. Only if the signs in the final two columns of the table are the same does that variable potentially confound the relationship between regime change and civil war.

* Political instability increases the likelihood only of restoration regime change, which has no effect on the outbreak of civil war.

- A. Poverty increases the likelihood of civil war, but states that experience regime change are not more likely to be poor.
- B. Population increases the likelihood of civil war, but states that experience regime change are less populous.
- C. Oil production increases the likelihood of civil war, but states that experience regime change do not produce (more) oil.
- D. Ethnic diversity increases the likelihood of civil war, but states that experience regime change are not more ethnically diverse.
- E. Rough terrain is uncorrelated with regime change and civil war.
- F. Ongoing civil wars increase the likelihood of regime change, but ongoing civil wars decrease the likelihood of another civil war onset.
- G. Buffer states are more likely to experience regime change, but buffer states are not more likely to suffer civil wars (see below).
- H. Political instability increases the likelihood of civil war, but political instability is correlated only with restoration FIRC, which does not increase the likelihood of civil war (Chapter 2 and below).

¹ This list omits characteristics of interstate dyads that may be relevant for regime change but are irrelevant for civil war, such as joint democracy or state similarity. The analysis that produced these results was performed on the same state-year dataset that generated the results for civil war reported in this chapter. I address the effect of these dyadic variables in Chapter 5.

Among regime changes that occur, states that experience leadership FIRC are not poorer, more populated, more likely to be new, or less likely to be democratic.

3. Evidence against Selection Bias: Instrumental Variables

I have been unable to identify a variable in the country-year format used in this chapter that is correlated with regime change but not with civil war. Because the dataset is not dyadic, it is impossible to include variables that measure aspects of the relationship between states that might explain regime change but not civil war and thus serve as useful instruments, such as the distance between interveners and targets and the balance of power between them. Therefore, I built a directed-dyad dataset (the dataset used in Chapter 5) that includes measures of the relationship between pairs of states in addition to the same variables used so far to account for the characteristics of individual states.² I use two variables—State A's share of the dyad's total material capabilities and the distance between States A and B—as instruments for regime change. I use these two variables as an instrument for regime change in the second stage of the model, shown in the bottom half of the table. In models 15 and 16, I use a ten-year treatment for regime change and the dependent variable is the onset of civil war in a given year. In models 17 and 18, regime change is instrumented only in the year it occurs and the dependent variable is a dummy variable indicating whether a civil war occurs anytime in the ensuing ten years. As shown in the first two rows of the lower half of Table 3.13R, either approach yields positive and significant coefficients for all types of regime change grouped together and leadership regime change specifically.³

² The significant complication this procedure introduces is that each civil war State B experiences in a given year appears in every dyad of which State B is a member in that year. For example, the Ugandan civil war that began in 1980 appears in all ten dyads (with the United States, Britain, France, Russia, DRC, Kenya, Tanzania, Rwanda, Sudan, and China) in which Uganda is State B in 1980. In other words, a model intended to predict the onset of civil war in Uganda in 1980 would predict the same civil war ten times. This problem will reduce the standard errors of the control variables but should not affect the regime change estimates because regime change occurs in only one of those dyads.

³ Additional tests indicate that although the instruments in these models are valid—that is, sufficiently correlated with regime change—they are overidentified, meaning that one or more of the instruments is correlated with the error term of the regression or the structural model is incorrectly specified. Removing State A's share of dyadic capabilities and using only distance as an instrument for regime change, the models are no longer overidentified and both types of regime change remain significant.
