

Additional Table for “Desperate Times, Desperate Measures:
The Causes of Civilian Victimization in War.”

In a section of my article “Desperate Times, Desperate Measures” entitled “Cause and Effect: Does Desperation Precede Civilian Victimization,” I investigate the question of whether civilian victimization actually occurs after a conflict becomes a war of attrition as my theory expects. I compiled a list of all the cases in which civilian victimization occurred in a war of attrition, and examined when civilian targeting began. This table presents the details of this analysis. Briefly, I found that in 30 out of 36 cases, attrition preceded civilian victimization. Of the 6 where targeting of noncombatants preceded attrition (indicated by italics below), all were also wars to annex territory, which was the motivation that caused civilian victimization to occur before the conflict became an attrition war. Moreover, in 4 of the 6 (Russo-Turkish, Greco-Turkish, Germany-Poland, Germany-Soviet Union), additional, different strategies of civilian victimization were initiated by belligerents after the onset of attrition. In only 2 cases, therefore—Romania 1941 and North Korea 1950—did attrition not influence the implementation of a strategy of civilian victimization.
